

Neighbourhood governance and community engagement

22 November 2005
Kings Fund Centre, central London

£60 to £120

The government is proposing 'neighbourhood arrangements' and a neighbourhood charter, as part of the process of 'putting power into the hands of the community'. How will this mesh with other policies promoting community engagement and capacity building? What are the realities of making local democracy work, with varying structures designed to give decision-making influence or powers to residents?

Much of the discussion about this unfolding agenda has focused on local authorities and councillors. But the potential role of community groups and organisations, neighbourhood forums and committees, has to be clarified if participative democracy is to function at the local level. Which services are appropriate for decision-making in neighbourhoods, and which are appropriate for formal influence? How will the neighbourhood be defined? How will we deal with conflict in the definition of problems within and between neighbourhoods?

This national conference will explore how people in local communities can play their part in effective neighbourhood governance. It will include the opportunity to participate in the Neighbourhood Governance Game which has been designed to help people explore these issues.

The event will be chaired by Carol Hayden, Associate Director, Shared Intelligence. Speakers include Charles Woodd from the Civil Renewal Unit of the Home Office, providing a government perspective on the community sector's role in neighbourhood governance; and Susie Hay, regeneration and participation consultant, who will discuss the importance of informal networking at local level. A research perspective will be provided by Paul Hilder from the Young Foundation and Paul Skidmore from Demos. A panel including representatives of local organisations will contribute to a discussion in the concluding session.
